

In the 1914-18 War, a British agent used a boy with a kite to get information across the Dutch border from occupied Belgium. When the wind was right, the kite was cut loose and picked up by a friend, who removed the messages which had been attached to it.

Spies often used dogs as messengers in frontier areas during the last war, as sentries were more likely to make friends with the animals than to search them. One agent even trained a dog to jump the electric fence at a frontier.

Another spy trick was to have the head shaved clean, then secret information was tattooed on the scalp. When the hair had grown again, the spy could face a frontier search quite calmly.

A spy's contact examines the information he has brought-written in invisible ink on his shirt collar!

A French farmer indicated the number of German Army divisions in a frontier area, by the number of sheep he put in a certain field. His contact simply trained his binoculars across the frontier at the field to find out the strength of the German defenses.

Many ingenious hidden cameras have been devised to aid secret agents to take forbidden photographs. Here a spy lights his cigarette—and takes a photo of a new fighter plane of the same line. The camera is concealed in the lighter.
